An appeal from a bankruptcy court decision may go through several levels. Unless a circuit court has permitted direct appeal, the first level of appeal is either to the district court in which the bankruptcy judge sits or to the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel in the circuit in which the bankruptcy court is located. From there an appeal may be taken to the court of appeals in the circuit where the bankruptcy court sits. Third, on petition for certiorari, an appeal may be taken to the U.S. Supreme Court, subject to the Supreme Court's grant of review.

Appeals from a bankruptcy court decision to a district court, Bankruptcy Appellate Panel, or circuit court are governed by § 158 of Title 28.¹ The rules applicable to these appeals at the district court and Bankruptcy Appellate Panel level are set forth in Part VIII of the Federal Rules of Bankruptcy Procedure² and local rules or operating procedures which the district court or appellate panel may have published.³ Appeals to the circuit courts are governed by the Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure supplemented by the circuit's local rules and procedures, if any.⁴

All appeals are also governed by a well-established proposition that, absent the most extreme circumstances, legal theories not raised squarely in the lower courts, cannot be broached for the first time on appeal.⁵ Thus, if there is any chance of an appeal, counsel must raise all theories of recovery or defense or waive the right to appeal them after trial.
